SPEAKER'S RULINGPart 1: To allege that another member is not a good human being is unparliamentary

It was brought up on Friday, March 6th, when the member for Sackville-Cobequid rose on a point of order alleging that the Premier during Question Period the previous day implied that the Leader of the Official Opposition “was not a good human being,” and later that day in Question Period told the member to “imagine his motive.”

The member alleges that these were two examples of unparliamentary language and that I, as Speaker, should request that the Premier withdraw the comments and apologize to the House and the Leader of the Official Opposition.

In Bosc and Gagnon, 3rd edition, 2017, Page 624: “In dealing with unparliamentary language, the Speaker takes into account the tone, manner and intention of the Member speaking, the person to whom the words at issue were directed, the degree of provocation, and most important, whether or not the remarks created disorder in the Chamber. Thus, language deemed unparliamentary one day may not necessarily be deemed unparliamentary on another day.”

There have been many Speaker rulings in this House underlining the importance of looking at the context in which words are spoken to determine whether words used are unparliamentary or not. To illustrate how important the context is, I further quote from Bosc and Gagnon at Page 624: “Expressions which are considered unparliamentary when applied to an individual Member have not always been considered so when applied ‘in a generic sense’ or to a party.”

On the first part of the member for Sackville-Cobequid’s assertion, I have reviewed Hansard of the question and the answer given by the Premier on March 5, 2020.

The Premier stated: “We will continue to ensure that he stays in treatment, whatever his political future may be. I can tell you for certain, no one in this caucus, under my leadership, will try to gain political points on someone else’s suffering. That is just a reality. It’s what is called being a good human being.”

It appears that the Premier was referring to the expected actions of the members of his caucus under his leadership. He did not allege or state that the Leader of the Official Opposition was not a good human being. While the words if directed to an individual member may be found to be unparliamentary, they are not in this case, as they were directed in a generic sense to members of the Party caucus and not the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Accordingly, the words were not unparliamentary language in this case, and there is no point of order.

SPEAKER’S RULING

Part 2: To tell another member to “imagine your motive” is unparliamentary

On the second part of the member for Sackville-Cobequid’s assertion, I have also reviewed Hansard.

In his point of order the member for Sackville-Cobequid alleges that the Premier used unparliamentary language when he told the member “to imagine his motive.” I assume from his point of order that the member for Sackville-Cobequid meant to raise that the Premier was “imputing bad motives” of the Leader of the Official Opposition rather than using unparliamentary language.

In a ruling on April 4, 2013, Speaker Gosse spoke at length about “imputing motives” of a member. I want to quote from portions of that ruling. Speaker Gosse stated: “Beauchesne goes on to say on Page 142 that

. . . ‘a member will not be permitted by the Speaker to . . . impute to any members or members unworthy motives for their actions in a particular case.’”

The meaning of the phrase, “impute bad motives,” as used in parliamentary context is sometimes questioned. Often it is not clear that the imputation being complained of is one of bad motives when a complaint is raised that another member is “imputing motives.” It is assumed when that phrase is used that the motives are bad or different from any motives that may have been acknowledged.

The Parliament of Canada publishes a Glossary of Parliamentary Procedures, which defines “to impute motives as to . . . ascribe objectionable motives or motives to a member different from those acknowledged by the member.” Their underlying principle is that one member should not allege that another member has said or done something for an unworthy or hidden purpose.

It is well-established in this House that it is not acceptable to impute improper motives to another member.

On March 5th, the Premier responded to the Leader of the Official Opposition’s question as follows: “He has not brought one idea to the floor of the Legislature about improving the lives of Nova Scotians. What he has attempted to do is try to tear down the reputations of others, people sitting on this side of the House or people who have challenging things in their lives. Imagine your motive. What goes through an individual’s mind when you’re going to build your own reputation on the backs of those who are suffering?”

Accordingly, in relying on the authorities and the rulings of this House, I find the words used by the Premier to have imputed motives to another member, that being the Leader of the Official Opposition.

However, in response to the member for Sackville-Cobequid’s point of order on Friday, March 6th, the Premier rose and spoke and apologized by stating: “Let me say on behalf of you and the members in this gallery, if anyone was offended by anything I said yesterday, I apologize to them.”

He later said: “If in any way that offends anybody in this House, I want to apologize to them . . .”

There was an immediate apology at two separate points in the Premier’s response to the member for Sackville-Cobequid’s point of order. The apology was directed to “anybody in the House for anything I said yesterday.” This reference was wide and broad and all-encompassing.

According to Bosc and Gagnon on Page 625 if an apology is given by a member in the House, it is accepted in good faith and the matter is considered closed.

Therefore, I am satisfied that when the Premier apologized twice during his response to the member for Sackville-Cobequid's point of order that the matter was dealt with, and accordingly, I find the point of order to be closed.
